Weight of Bill Jones' Fish Puzzles Mathematicians

Only One More Day to Work for The Times Prize—Editor Will Receive Answers Until Tomorrow Night.

Washington has had fish on the brain for the past six days. The weight of Bill Jones' whopping fish has puzzled thousands of the best citizens, and among the replies on the Problem Editor's desk there are as many as a locate different answers submitted by dozen different answers submitted by the same person.

Almost every one of the contestants for the $5 offered for the first correct answer to the question, "What was the weight of this wonderful fiste?" employed algebra. Each writer seemed confident he or she had the correct weight of the fish.

The question is this: Bill says the head weighed twelve pounds, the tail as much as the head plus half the body, and the body as much as the tail and head together. What was the total weight of this fish? The problem is as simple as rolling off a greased log. Answers sent in as late as tomorrow night will have the same chance of winning the $5 as those submitted earlier.
